Artist: Amanda Acheson

I love light. I love how light drapes across objects giving them dimension. I love how light can make you see an image, without the image being there. With these old cruiser bicycles, I want to show the light draping across them and then allowing the viewer to see the whole bike, simply by seeing the shadow. These bikes have character and history, which makes them unique. What I paint is their portrait. I want to share the beauty of these old creatures. I want the light to illuminate their beauty and the shadows to show how graceful they were when they were new. Even though the viewer won't be able to see the whole frame, they can still understand what the bicycle looks like, its uniqueness, curves, and even some of the sparkle that they once had. Maybe the viewer will relate to their own bicycle, and give it a bit more love after seeing these images....
